SAM Broadcaster PRO 2020.1.Á .Known in the art is a method of molding a rubber sheet into a desired shape as described, for example, in Japanese Patent Publication No. 50-37887, which comprises the steps of extruding a rubber elastomer mixed with an adhering resin through an extruder or the like in the form of a continuous flow; cutting the extrudate at the desired length of an extrudate section of a predetermined shape and uniting the cut extrudate sections with each other; and vulcanizing the uniting extrudate sections together to form a rubber sheet having an adhering resin layer thereon. However, this conventional method has the following problem. At the step of cutting the continuous flow at the desired length, when extrusion and cutting are conducted in the same extrusion line, the adhering resin layer formed on the rubber sheet surface tends to be detached as the cutting advances. As a result, the adhering resin layer formed on the rubber sheet becomes irregular in thickness or largely uneven. In addition, when the extrusion and cutting of the extrudate are conducted independently of each other, the product obtained by extruding the continuous flow through the extruder has a different cross section from that of the product obtained by cutting the continuous flow at the desired length. Furthermore, the adhesive strength of the adhering resin layer in contact with the rubber sheet is reduced by the temperature rising in the course of the extrusion or the vulcanization process, resulting in cracking of the adhesive resin layer. There has also been proposed a method of manufacturing a rubber sheet comprising a substrate layer formed from a rubber sheet and 3e33713323
