Recommendations {#S7}

===== Undergoing home hemodialysis (for end-stage renal disease patients) should be recommended for patients who meet the following criteria: the patient wants to undergo home hemodialysis, the provider recommends home hemodialysis and the patient has adequate access to a home dialysis unit. Home hemodialysis should be recommended to patients who cannot be successfully treated with another dialysis modality (including peritoneal dialysis and continuous ambulatory peritoneal dialysis). In patients who cannot be successfully treated with other dialysis modalities and have end-stage renal disease, home hemodialysis should be recommended for patients who are expected to experience better survival rates with home hemodialysis as compared to a hospital dialysis unit. In patients with end-stage renal disease who cannot be successfully treated with other dialysis modalities, the current evidence does not support the use of home hemodialysis in patients who have a higher risk of death or may not adhere to home dialysis. The use of home hemodialysis in patients who are not expected to have better survival rates with home hemodialysis or who are unable to adhere to home dialysis should be discouraged. In patients with end-stage renal disease who have congestive heart failure, the current evidence does not support the use of home hemodialysis. See full recommendations.

model for hematological toxicity testing. Poultry research traditionally has used broilers as a model organism to study hematological effects of environmental toxicants. However, the in vivo response of broilers and the variation in hematological parameters within a broiler flock render results of these studies difficult to interpret. The development of the chicken embryo model has contributed to the assessment of hematological changes associated with environmental toxicants. The chick embryo hematological assay has been used successfully to assess the hematological effects
