Clients and clients' families have traditionally paid for the process of cancer diagnosis and treatment directly. This approach has resulted in higher costs, greater disparity in the availability of care, and the ability of individuals or families to choose among multiple providers is limited. Under this grant, the Weill Medical College of Cornell University proposes to test the cost effectiveness of providing cancer patients a choice of treatment, with the hope that this offers the patient and family an opportunity for a better quality of life. Specifically, the proposed study will build on findings from a community based randomized trial of prepaid groups in which patients were offered the option of either a private plan, with a maximum out-of-pocket payment of $2,000, or a prepaid group plan, with no out-of-pocket payment (Findley et al., 1993). Patients offered a prepaid group plan were more satisfied with the care they received and chose treatment from a provider nearer their home than did patients offered a private plan. This study tests the hypothesis that a prepaid group plan will increase the proportion of patients choosing to undergo aggressive therapy for cancer (i.e., surgery, radiation therapy, or chemotherapy) and will increase the proportion of patients choosing non-aggressive therapy. One group will receive the new plan during their chemotherapy treatment. The second group will receive the old plan. The difference in the effectiveness of the two plans will be evaluated in terms of: (a) patients' motivation to receive treatment; (b) the proportion of patients receiving aggressive therapy; (c) the average length of time for receiving treatment; (d) the proportion of patients choosing community-based rather than hospital-based treatment; and (e) the patient and family's choice of therapy.
