Q: How to reduce the distance between two points? I have two points on a line with a length. How can I find the slope of the line, and based on that slope, I want to find the direction of the line? A: If the two points lie on the same line (as in your diagram), then there will be no slope, and the only direction you can have is horizontal. If you are looking for the slope of the line that will "take you the shortest possible distance", then you should use the length of the vector between the points as the slope. If this vector is negative, then it will take you to the right (left if it's positive), and if it's positive it will take you down (up if it's negative). If the two points aren't on the same line, then you need to find the slope of the line which goes through the two points (in other words the perpendicular line to the line between the two points). A: @Kumargix comment is right. But I am not totally agree to the opinion that there is no slope. You may find the slope of the line in the following way. After get the direction vector from the first point to the second point: $\vec{v} = (x_2 - x_1, y_2 - y_1)$ If the slope is constant, the line always has a slope of: $m = \frac{y_2 - y_1}{x_2 - x_1}$ So you may divide one of
