I have always enjoyed hiking. It's not so much a physical activity as an intellectual and emotional one. Over the years, I have explored more of the western half of South Carolina than I have of eastern. This past year, I felt the pull to explore the western half again and was fortunate to meet a local hiker who wanted to go along. My first impression of the path was pretty good. It was pretty rocky, but the rocks weren't a problem. I had a small backpack and that was no problem either. Soon, we were surrounded by trees. The path led into an old growth forest, an uncommon thing in West Virginia. The path was a little uneven, but it wasn't too steep. And I found myself looking at the pine trees and feeling very connected to the outdoors. The trees were very tall. In many places, I was at least 15 feet up in the air, looking straight down at the path as it curved around rocks and other obstacles. At this point, we had hiked for a couple of hours and were still in the mountains. The path led into a creek, where the water was flowing fast. It was wet and I was splashing through the shallow water. There were clumps of trees on the side of the creek, trees that had been cut down and tossed into the water. We were close to the beginning of the Appalachian Trail and, at this point, I felt a little left out. The Appalachian Trail was still fairly new in the West Virginia mountains. I didn't know much about it, but I knew it had been there for a long time. I could see it easily, but it had become more common over the years. I knew it was a famous hiking path, but I didn't realize it was a national historic trail. I also didn't realize that thousands of hikers pass through every year. We passed the first aid station, where a fire road led up the mountain. I thought about the time, many years ago, when I was hiking up that same fire road and I

What's New in the Noise Shampoo?

With the help of Noise Shampoo you have the possibility to configure the chroma and the clean effects and preview the edited image. The Clean controller enables you to change the luminosity. In addition, the higher this setting is, the more surfaces get processed. The Noise controller will make your photo more noisy and the more possible an adjustment of the clean filter is needed. If you want to compare the settings with the default settings, click on the button [Default]. This is the output: The Noise Shampoo default settings can be found here: Additional: This plugin is a single Photoshop document. This document is not marked as updateable. It will be distributed with the plugin. The update document will be distributed in the next update. Instructions: Select your layer and use the button [Create Plugin] to create a new plugin. If you want to use the default settings, click on the button [Default]. Set the settings by clicking on the corresponding button [Chroma] to adjust the chroma or the button [Clean] to adjust the luminosity or the button [Noise] to adjust the noise filter. If you want to apply a change to the settings, press [Update Plugin] and return to the main window. Select the button [Luminosity] to change the luminosity and the button [Controllers] to switch between the two controllers. After changing the settings, you can now save the plugin. Saving your plugin: In the main window select the button [Save Plugin] and save your settings to a new plugin. Installation: Please refer to your current Adobe Photoshop installation manual.
