Grammy-winning hip-hop artist and activist Common (born Albert Horne) died on May 16 after losing a nine-month battle with prostate cancer. He was 46. The family announced his death in a statement published on his website. "He lived a life of purpose, creativity, caring for others, family, God and nature. He was a private man, who loved playing basketball and golf, writing poetry and rap lyrics, playing chess, acting, reading and cooking for his friends and family," the statement read. "He was filled with compassion, humility and most of all love. He made a tremendous difference in so many lives and touched the lives of millions and millions with the way he inspired, touched and uplifted our people and the world." Ishmael "Atiku" Abu-Zaid, a member of Common's University Of The People, told NPR that the rapper and activist passed away at the end of May in his home in Brooklyn, New York. "He was taken from us on May 16th," Abu-Zaid told NPR. "At that time I was staying at his home. His wife, mother and his daughter were with him." They were immediately taken to a hospital but he was pronounced dead at around 1 p.m. ET. The cause of death was not revealed. Common, born in Syracuse, New York, was a veteran of the Bronx, attending public schools and playing basketball at Syracuse University, before a short stint with the NBA's Toronto Raptors.
