Devices generating web traffic that is all in same content type. For example, we have a share article feature that generates web traffic from every article of the site. We want to know whether those are relevant? Ideally, we should be able to get a yes/no answer for that. But, that's a problem in the real world. I don't think this is possible unless you find a tool that can do it for you, but there's a chance somebody else has found one. My personal experience is that it's more important to have good headlines than titles. Titles can be used to convert more users, but they're better used for things like blog posts, or in some kind of PPC or SEO context. Headlines, on the other hand, are for the front page, so to speak. That said, I do use Tite, and I like it a lot. I'll use it on the home page, of course, and I'll use it for all the articles, but that's about it. If we're talking about professional resources, you could check out the SEO Tools or basic tools plugins. Basically, it's where you start a title from. So, if you have a 20-word article, you might start with something like "The video title for this article.", and then you end up with something like "The video title for this article." - Spelling, spacing and so on could
