Predictors of medical and surgical complications in acute traumatic brain injury: A multi-center analysis of 10,958 patients.

Traumatic brain injury (TBI) is a leading cause of mortality and morbidity. Predictors of surgical complications following TBI are incompletely understood. To identify predictors of complications in TBI patients undergoing craniotomy for decompression. A prospective multi-center database was created for the Predicting Medical Complications of Head Injury TBI Study (PROMIS) that included patients ages

16-50 years with ≥ 3 intracranial injuries who underwent craniotomy. Subjects were grouped by surgery type and analysis was performed on the predictors of medical complications and length of stay. The cohort included 10,958 subjects (4776 female, 60.5%; median age 36 years, IQR 27-47). Overall, 73% had co-morbidities, 34% had focal neurological deficits, and 48% were clinically decompressed. Surgical complications developed in 12% and ranged from 11% for medical treatments to 15% for craniotomies. Over half of these were technically associated (i.e. dural breaching, temporal lobe, skin). Age, congestive heart failure, low Glasgow Coma Score (GCS), intraventricular hemorrhage (IVH), temporal resection, and type of craniotomy were predictors of complications. Higher GCS, surgery type, and pre-injury modified Rankin Score were predictors of length of stay. The data illustrate that a significant proportion of complications associated with craniotomy for TBI are technically related to craniotomy rather than to the craniotomy itself. Age and pre-injury injury status were important predictors of both medical and surgical complications. The data highlight the importance of minimizing the risk of surgical complications associated with
