Metals in urban soils and their accumulation rates in various fractions were investigated in the 0-3m sediment, 0.3-1m, 1-3m and 3-5m aquitard horizons of residential areas. The highest concentrations of Cd, Pb and Zn were measured in the 0-3m sediment with concentrations (ranging from 0.08 to 48, 0.11 to 39, and 0.36 to 546mg/kg, respectively) about five to tenfold higher than those measured in the 3-5m aquitard horizon (ranged from 0.00 to 3.34, 0.00 to 2.95, and 0.01 to 48.1mg/kg, respectively). The non-residual fraction, of which organic matter is the principal component, was the most significant contributor to contamination in the 0-3m sediment. Zn concentrations in the 0-3m sediment samples increased rapidly with increasing depth. However, most of the Pb and Cd in the soils derived from the 0-3m sediment. The concentration of Pb in the 3-5m aquitard horizon samples increased with increasing depth, as did the concentration of Cd. The concentration of Zn in the 3-5m aquitard horizon samples significantly decreased with increasing depth. The results of the correlation analysis indicated that the following metals were correlated with each other and with pH in different aquitard horizons: Cd was significantly correlated with Cu, Pb and Zn, suggesting that these metals had some common sources. { "extends": "../..../tslint-rules/base.tslint.json", "rules": { "directive-selector": [true, "attribute",

Preventive effect of resveratrol against NSAID-induced ulcer and inflammation in rats. Oral administration of non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs (NSAIDs) leads to serious gastric mucosal damage, and therapeutic agents for NSAID-induced gastric ulcers include antacids, rebamipide, tranexamic acid and misoprostol. The present study was designed to test whether resveratrol, a natural polyphenolic compound produced by grapes, has a preventive effect against NSAID-induced ulcer. Wistar rats were orally administered 1 ml of 100 mg/ml of indomethacin with or without oral administration of different doses of resveratrol (5, 25, 50 mg/kg) and then ulcer lesions were induced by 30% ethanol.

Macroscopic and histological analysis revealed that resveratrol significantly decreased the incidence of ulcer formation in a dose-dependent manner. In addition, resveratrol treatment significantly ameliorated the acute edema and mucosal damage induced by indomethac
