Valproic acid (VPA) is an antiepileptic drug that induces hepatotoxicity in humans, and the pathogenesis of this remains unclear. To determine the pathogenic mechanism of VPA-induced hepatotoxicity, VPA was evaluated for its effect on hepatocyte apoptosis and caspase activity. Results showed that the ultrastructural and biochemical alterations induced by VPA treatment corresponded to caspase-3-dependent apoptosis. To support these findings, the effect of VPA on hepatocytes was evaluated in the HepaRG cell model. Hepatocyte apoptosis induced by VPA was associated with a decrease in cell viability, alteration of cell cycle, and an increase in caspase-3 activity. Pretreatment of hepatocytes with VPA or transfection of hepatocytes with the caspase-3 gene decreased the induction of apoptosis. The intrinsic pathway was suggested as the main mechanism of apoptosis induction by VPA, although the results obtained with mitochondrial membrane permeability showed that it was not the only mechanism involved. This study shows that VPA may induce apoptosis in primary rat hepatocytes and HepaRG cells through the intrinsic apoptotic pathway. These results suggest that the intrinsic apoptotic pathway is involved in the mechanism of hepatotoxicity induced by VPA.Myeloid cell-specific deficiency of glucose-6-phosphate dehydrogenase (G6PD) in X-linked chronic granulomatous disease (CGD) results in defective neutrophil apoptosis and is associated with severe bacterial and fungal infections. Glucose-6-phosphate dehydrogenase (G6PD) deficiency is a condition characterized by marked sensitivity to oxidative stress in the form of infection by periodontal pathogens, particularly Actinobacillus actinomycetemcomitans, and it has been associated with
