What's new in George: A Horror Story:

For a few brief years in the early nineties, Canadian hip-hop walked a wounded path. The great hip-hop explosion of the seventies and eighties gave way to rock, reggae, and even MC Hammer. Canada also lost a few of its hottest MCs to American and Jamaican labels, but a few found their way back home and the Canadian scene was fresh off the bus. Sceneofacts was one of the first to hit the charts with their song "Writing on the Wall," and there were plenty of others, including 2-zulu. The new order promised to give new life to the culture of hip-hop and, with a bit of time, the possibilities of what a Canadian scene could be. But then the commercialization of hip-hop took over. The culture was distorted and frozen in time, and the motives of its creators obscured. "We don't need any more history lessons," line in the lyrics of "Filthy Story." In 1994, Hip-Hop Solution broke up. "It all started out so well," Rapper Bastard, a member of the ill-fated crew said in an interview published in the Toronto Star. "The industry, it was a good opportunity for like me to do what I wanted to do. It was cool." Bastard's quote

reflects the standard narrative of the first generation of Canadians in hip-hop. Toronto, as the media capital of Canada, offered the country's first hip-hop scene. In the words of Sean Flowers, in his 1991 book, We Got the Rhythm: The Canadian Hip-Hop Experience, "First we thought of it as a Toronto thing but when the people started coming, from Calgary to Toronto, Halifax to Ottawa, it was more than just Toronto." Hip-Hop Solution brought the sounds of Jamaica, New York, and Houston to the independent Toronto scene, and after each exodus, came a new crew of the emigrants. The fruit was Mc Soul, the first all-Canadian crew of the boom. The crew began in 1992 and included Tall Douce, Busty Thunder, Wayne Blackwood, Cocoa Brovaz, the Tri-City Posse, and other members. Mc Soul quickly became one of the most popular crews in Toronto during their very short run (1995-1995), and its members went on to meet their maker in other crews. Perhaps the most notable late addition
