3003 - 15:13 The 3003 was the first of a series of improved machines that Gordon promised would be built and sold to the general public. The 3003 performed as advertised, thus lengthening the arms of the market. For two years Canada's finest programmers laboured away in a large room at 84 Hundale Street in Kitchener, trying to come up with the next-generation of basic. But at this point, the Juno project was dead. An economic contraction had reduced Canada's GDP by more than 10 per cent during the early 1980s, pulling money from things like scientific research and education. Software development was also being squeezed out of the federal government due to an election promise to cut government spending. Meanwhile, other government departments were struggling to survive and survive they did, cutting and slashing in ways that especially hurt the Canadian research and technology communities. Ontario especially felt the pinch, with major projects such as the CDRMP offshore-wind farm programming and the Data Conversion Project in Toronto being cut back to a bare-bones level. Creating a new computer gaming service from scratch was hardly a saving measure to be applauded. For a company that aspires to be profitable, it was a really sad story. The company was struggling, and was swimming in debt, and there was a market for an easy-to-use and fun-to-play game, but no one was offering one. Juno certainly would have been profitable with a two-year development cycle, but by 1982, a year had passed and the project had been canned by its financiers. And so it was that founder John Moffat was left with a bad business called poor software, and a crying need to fill it with something useful. He understood that this was a business where one could only be successful by being too cheap to lose money. This meant making extreme sacrifices in areas like engineering. It also meant lugging around to new prospects a product so incomplete that it itself called for much to perfect. Moffat's answer was the Juno 600. It was the first of three pieces of software developed by him and his team. At around $800 retail, it was affordable, and it was basic, consisting of simple one-player games with game code and sounds. It was meant to be an easy way for people who might not be computer experts to learn about computers. So it was named TK. About four years later, other members of the Team
