Adding basic effects to an image Add an effect to an image. There are two options to add an effect to an image in Elements 2019. You can either use the Effects panel, or the Film panel. Open the Effects panel by choosing Effects > Add Effects... and selecting Effects from the panel menu. The next step is to click on Film. This will open the following dialog box: Click on Overlay, and Photoshop Elements will automatically add a layer with the effect on top of the current selection. You can also deselect the box in the Adjust panel, which disables the effect, and just click on Add Effects. You will now see a new Layers panel. Click on the button above the panel to hide the Layers panel, because it is unneeded. Again, just click on Add Effects. This will add a new layer with the effect to the current selection. You can add more effects by doing the same process, and adding different effects. To quickly add a new layer with an effect, use Command + J on Mac or Control + J on Windows. American composer/banjo player Donald Wandrei, who has died aged 94, is one of the most important figures in 20th-century American music. It's true that he was not a jazz musician in the sense that Wynton Marsalis or Paul Chambers are jazz musicians, but he made some fascinating and radical changes to the genre. From the outset, he was a composer, writing at least 50 works for orchestral and chamber ensembles during his illustrious career, including symphonies, concertos and religious works. After receiving a PhD in philosophy from Harvard in 1941, Wandrei attended Juilliard in New York, where he was taught by John Cheever (later to become chief organist at Grace Cathedral in San Francisco). He won the C.G. Olson Jr Medal, one of the major American music awards, in 1953 for his Trumpet Concerto for Jazz Band. He soon became a prominent figure in American music, teaching at the Institute of Contemporary Art in Philadelphia, serving as music director of the Brooklyn Philharmonic and the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, and directing the Chamber Music Society of Washington, DC. In the 1970s he created the contemporary music series at Harvard. As a composer, Wandrei was a radical who was constantly challenging musical genres and traditions. From the "New World" of his New York school contemporaries Carl Ruggles and George Antheil to the postmodern and radical innovations of John Cage, J Whitehead, Eric Dolphy, LaMonte Young, Steve Reich and Steve Reich and Musicians, he demonstrated that there is no area of the arts that cannot be challenged by modern music. His music draws on the traditions of classical music, especially the jazz of the 1940s, and at the same time, he was a vocal supporter of the avant-garde of the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s. To make the point that Wandrei was a radical, we might consider his Trumpet Concerto. It is standard for a jazz band (and a kind of punk band with the aggressive trombones) to play a solo or piece that is built on the blues. Wandrei, however, uses a minimal number of ostinati derived from the chords of a popular song (in this instance Percy Faith's classic Attitude) and the composition is, in fact, conceived as a form of, in his words, "jazz-formalism"

Photo: Getty Images After 48 hours of back-and-forth, the public school district in the Pueblo town of Washington voted yesterday to close all city schools for the next five days. The Pueblo City Council, which has the final say on school closures, unanimously approved the plan on Monday. Officials say the reason for the closure: a shortage of non-perishable food, including milk, that has left many school districts and grocery stores across the country ordering large quantities of the shelf-stable product. "This is a very last-resort, because this has happened many times before, that public schools have had to be closed," says Washington School District Superintendent Kent Jenks. "We're not seeing any milk from the grocery stores around here. And we're not seeing any milk anywhere in the state." Despite Washington's proximity to Denver, Colorado's largest city, and several major grocery stores in the area, they've had no luck finding food. According to a press release on the school district's Facebook page, "The Public Health Department and state agriculture department is monitoring the situation and observing all county and state food limits." For some people, this is a surprise. As Jenks explains, closing schools is a last-resort because students who go to school out of town are often not covered by their parent's insurance. "Many of our students come from out of town, and are out of the school system," says Jenks. "So we're a small, rural school district, and a lot of our students can't be insured. So we would close schools for the uninsured." About 60 percent of Washington's 830 students live outside of city limits, according to district statistics. And Jenks says that the closing of schools isn't a bad idea, as most of the students who are affected come from out of town anyway. "I'd be more worried about the children in the community that have the food in the home, and that we're not keeping them safe, or their food supplies," says Jenks. "We're not able to cover all schools in our district, so schools may not be closed in other areas. So our priority is to open schools, protect the children,
