Some twenty-five or so years later I finally made it down there, and I'd like to share some of my impressions with you. Valles Centrales are a UNESCO World Heritage Site containing seventeen (17) natural canyons and craters, all of which were formed during the Holocene epoch (6,000 years ago). The canyons are deep and sharp-walled, with vertical walls and drop-offs on the order of some forty metres (140 ft). The number of canyons has been greatly reduced, probably due to wind and water erosion; all that remains today are four or five in total. By the time the glaciers and rivers had finished gouging these canyons out of the rock, they were deep and wide, averaging between 20 and 80 metres (60 to 260 ft) across, with overall depths reaching 100 metres (330 ft). The oldest of these canyons predate the other craters in the park, forming at the dawn of the Late Pleistocene; however, they are very much narrower, less than 10 metres wide at their widest point, and most are uni-lobate (i.e. they are easily split into two halves by a strike-slip displacement). The youngest is dated to between 7200-5500 years ago, which makes it younger than the Chaitén-Independencia-Nuevo Progreso caldera 648931e174

Carmen: The Camilla Variation Carmen: The Camilla Variation was a song from the musical Carmen, by the German composer, pianist and singer Adolph Gutman, which was recorded in a 1935 Paris version of the score by Herman Reiner and Karl Elmendorf, produced by Rudolf von Laban. The Camilla variation was based on the Carmen, leitmotif composed by Hector Berlioz in his suite Symphonie fantastique. The song is a variation on the main theme. References External links
