“Motion capture technology is a key part of the engine. The biggest leap forward is that it has evolved massively. It's no longer a small department in the game engine. It is now a whole department which creates many other departments,” said Zidane. “With the best blend of motion capture data and work on player animations, characteristics and how he controls the ball, this is a league that evolves every year.”

“When we started working on FIFA 18, we knew that, thanks to the development of motion capture technology, we could combine movements that already existed in the game and apply them to new and exciting situations. In FIFA 18, we used this extra technology to introduce dramatic finishing, seamless transitions between offensive and defensive actions and new variations of balls and players. For FIFA 22, we intend to use the same technology to introduce new systems and features and we have the ambition to create the most dynamic and original football game in the world.” Zidane went on to describe the additions in FIFA 22. “Starting with the gameplay, as I said, we have the ambition to create the most dynamic and original football game in the world. That means giving it the most realistic and immersive feel possible, but also using the technology to create something completely different to what we have seen before. When we started off on this new journey, we had to question many things and re-examine the fundamentals. “One of the big challenges was the update of the defensive AI. All of this has already been achieved in terms of the physical qualities, but what we have also done is to make the moment of decision, the moment in which the defender makes the right choice in his positioning, even more decisive in the match. “This technology also allows us to create a football experience that is truly unique. We have a lot of real-time updates that can be applied to the players. We can play with movement and we can play with the feeling of the sportsman that is in the game. And when the game is played in slow motion or time is slowed down, as you already saw in FIFA 18, it becomes a very cool, spectacular experience. It is the moment when it becomes really beautiful. We have a lot of other surprises like that, and we want to reveal them as we go along. The package is the most important thing. We always aim to push the envelope of what is possible.💎
