The present invention relates generally to a wireless communication device and, more particularly, to a phased-array antenna module for use with such a wireless communication device. Wireless communication devices are becoming ever more popular and more numerous. As a result of the increase in use of wireless communication devices, there has been a related increase in the demand for such devices. In order to increase production efficiencies and decrease costs associated with manufacturing, integrated circuit (IC) components are increasingly being implemented into one or more wireless communication devices. Each IC component typically includes one or more semiconductor packages containing the IC components. Because of the relatively large size of each package, the IC component also typically includes a corresponding antenna or antenna module to provide radio frequency (RF) communication with a base station. The antenna module typically includes one or more antenna elements, a feed network for electrically connecting the antenna elements to an RF transceiver, and a plastic housing for accommodating the IC components and the feed network. The plastic housing is typically formed of a glass-filled epoxy or a polypropylene material, such as polypropylene (PP) or polyethylene terephthalate (PET). To enhance the performance of the antenna module and to facilitate the manufacturing process, the plastic housing is typically molded in such a manner that it facilitates easy extraction and removal of the IC components. Moreover, the IC components are typically fixedly connected to the housing, so that a particular range of acceptable, but yet high, package heights will be maintained. A particular application for a wireless communication device relates to one in which the device is carried by a human user while the user is engaged in physical activity. For example, when engaged in jogging, bicycling, or skiing, the user may have the □ Characteristics of the prostate specific antigen system in the human epididymis and testes. This study was conducted to characterize the distribution of a prostate specific antigen (PSA) and its isoelectric variants in the human epididymis and testes. Intense PSA staining was associated with the epithelial lining of the epididymis, Sertoli cells, and germ cells of the testes. Epididymis-only staining was intense, especially in the head, corpus, and caput regions. Only one fraction of PSA from the testes had the expected isoelectric mobility (4.95 pI), whereas most of the epididymal PSA was at 6.5 pI ($p < 0.001$). These differences in PSA isoform distribution suggest that the isoelectric system of PSA in the epididymis reflects a completely distinct intracellular protein as compared with the pattern seen in the testes. Forced entry tools such as crow bars, pry bars, and hammers are commonly used to break through obstacles such as doors, windows, or vehicles to gain access to a room or vehicle. While the damaging force of these tools may be sufficient to break through walls, windows, and vehicles, these tools generally do not have enough force to break through doors without being able to breach the door in the first instance. It is desirable to have a tool that can provide a breach in the door itself. Other door breach tools, such as the Air Strike™, create a breach through the door which may allow an egress from a house but generally do not actually cause a breach in the outer walls. Furthermore, while

Finding an RPG that doesn't make me want to play it can be difficult.
