Blogging is a great way to share your skills and your interests with others online, whether you do it as a hobby or as a career.

In this chapter, I show you the basics of using Photoshop to add background images to your blog's text or blog-post text. You also learn how to modify your photos to make them more interesting, and I show you the basics of enhancing your images to make them pop, such as brightening, cropping, or adjusting colors and contrast. Finally, I show you how to export your images to a web server that can then be posted to anywhere that has access to the Internet. ## Finding and Saving a Background The first thing you need to do to add photos to your blog is to find the photos that you want to use. After you take the photos, you need to save them. You can't save a photo in a blog post! You need to save it as a file. Saving a photo isn't difficult, but there's a bit of work involved. To create a photo file in Photoshop, you need to create a new layer. Layers are the building blocks of a Photoshop document. They're like virtual pads on which you lay out your photos, text, and other elements so you can create and change your design. You can create them by using the Select tool, which I describe in Chapter 6, or by using the Layers dialog box, covered in this chapter. ## Creating a Layer and Saving a Background When you first start creating a Photoshop document, you typically load your photos into Photoshop's

What's New In?

Betting on the Israeli army's pullout from the Gaza Strip is an entirely new ball game for North American bookmakers, with some of them taking their first bets on the outcome of the withdrawals. Now that the Israelis have started their pullout, the bookies have gone from being openly skeptical of the Israeli withdrawal, to calling for bets on the outcome to be taken out, with some already having over 20-1 odds. The bookies have not been at their tables long enough to get a handle on the outcome, but it's quite an about-face from their opinions when the US, and others, are calling on Israel to keep the withdrawals in place. It's not like the bookmakers are betting against the Israelis. An early bettor was Ladbrokes, which opened bets at 7-1 on the last major government to pull out of Gaza, the British withdrawal. "Betting on this pullout is a new sport to the bookmakers, so we'll let them get on with it," Ladbrokes spokesman Thomas Harvey said. "There have been bets that have already been taken, which puts the average price at around 10-1, which is very good value," he added. Ladbrokes is a respected name in the betting industry, and similar bets on other pullouts have been taken with other bookmakers, with odds of 10-1 on the Portuguese to pull out of Angola, and as low as 7-1 on the US pullout from Iraq. “We’re aware that such bets are being taken on the Israeli withdrawal, but we hope the public will not get ahead of themselves in thinking Israel will definitely withdraw,” Harvey said. The betting site was not commenting on the cause of the Israeli pullout, which continues to dominate the front pages around the world, but a Ladbrokes spokesman said the Israelis were the latest government to be forced to pull back. “So far, we’re getting good odds on the Israelis, and that has never been the case for the last time Israel pulled out,” he said. While the Israelis may have been cautious to fully pull out of Gaza without first securing the border area, Ladbrokes said it expects them to launch a ground invasion to secure the border, which has been an issue for the Israeli leadership since they launched the withdrawal plan. “
