Features Key:

- Ancient mole people have risen to become rulers of the Rodent Empire. They rule through non-abusive authoritarian government. They rarely interact with anyone outside of their empire, and their only army is their reputation for being ruthless and often indifferent to the lives of their citizens. They are ascetic and religious. They are technophilic, and culture is egalitarian.
- Each player is either a Rodent or one of their secret allies, and alliances and de-alliances are taken seriously. Players who act weakly in the course of their play-match have their military might reduced by 0.5. Players often use rigging of the starting conditions to gain an advantage. The monarch and the senate enact a number of laws, and rules for military drafting and conscription. Both factions use claims of relic looting, alien abductions, and voodoo-based superstitions to raise armies.
- The player must form an alliance with the Rodents, so that they may enter the election for monarch. One of the alliances may attempt to assassinate the previous monarch, force a revolution, or seize power in a coup.
- Election for monarch is either ruled-out or rigged. All players will organize early to ensure one of their factions gets at least one faction vote in the election, or votes are awarded for faction members who are not in the election.
- Governments have high public support. If this is low, factions may not be able to form governments.
