Celiac plexus neurolysis (CPN) for unresectable pancreatic cancer (PC) is associated with high efficacy and low toxicity. We present a case of an elderly patient with unresectable PC with no indication for surgical bypass who was managed initially with CPN, and underwent successful gastric bypass later. CPN was performed with a fine needle aspiration technique using mixture of 40% ethanol and 0.025% bupivacaine, and successful outcomes were demonstrated by patient and biochemical parameters. CPN is safe and effective, and a potential alternative therapy for unresectable PC, to reduce or eliminate need for aggressive debulking, and induce hepatic metastasis/regression. Innervation of splenic lymphoid tissues and of the thymus is altered by adrenergic receptor blockade. Immune cell activity requires adequate availability of circulating or central nervous system-derived catecholamines. We have found that lymphocyte homing to peripheral lymphoid tissues is blocked by treatment with phentolamine (a non-specific alpha-adrenergic receptor antagonist), and that adrenergic receptor blockade may compromise the antigen-presenting function of splenic macrophages. Since we have also shown that adrenergic receptors are present on resident perivascular cells and that the spleen contains multiple fibroblastic cell types, we now investigated the possibility that peripheral lymphoid tissues are innervated by nervous elements and that their function may be altered by adrenergic receptor blockade. Indeed, we have found that (1) sympathetic fibers are present in most, but not all, regions of the rat spleen; (2) lamina propria cells may be cholinergic but not adrenergic in origin; (3) adrenergic receptors are present on mouse perivascular macrophages; and (4) adrenergic receptors are present on splenic stromal fibroblasts. In addition, we found that adrenergic receptor blockade (using phentolamine) alters the level of in vivo lymphocyte homing to the splenic lymphoid tissues. This is likely to result from compromised antigen presentation by e79caf774b
