As an example, data integrity can be maintained within data transmission networks when data packets arrive at a destination node with the same form as when they were transmitted from the source node. This is particularly important when transmitting data across networks over unsecured links. In many applications, data is encrypted prior to transmission over a network so that it cannot be read by any intermediate or destination node without a secret encryption key. Moreover, to prevent subsequent tampering, the encrypted data can be transmitted in a tamper-proof digital signature format. However, data messages can be modified by a malicious sender or by the storage media which collects and stores data. As a result, data integrity can be lost before it arrives at its destination, or a signature can be forged to corrupt the data's integrity.A morphological study of angiogenic abnormalities in the brain and pituitary of a girl with prolactin deficiency and macroprolactinomas: an autoaggressive process or an acquired endocrine defect? The principal focus of this study is to understand the mechanism for the association between macroprolactinomas and hyperprolactinaemia. As an adjunct to this study, the mechanisms involved in and the relationship between familial prolactin deficiency and hyperprolactinaemia in the absence of macroprolactinomas were also examined. This was a morphological study using 3H-thymidine labelling to demonstrate actively proliferating cells in macroprolactinomas in a 14-year-old woman with familial prolactin deficiency, hyperprolactinaemia, and macroprolactinomas. In addition, the changes in cell proliferation and involution of macroprolactinomas in this patient were examined by using conventional histology and a modified histological technique to demonstrate and quantify senile adenohipophysial cell involution. On the basis of the results
