Bengal kings and queens in ancient India, these famous historical figures. Background: Animal and plant foods may be contaminated by metals, organic compounds, and pathogens, and these contaminants have the potential to influence human health. To identify contaminants in meat and fish, researchers have developed rapid methods to detect microorganisms, residues of pesticides, veterinary drugs, and heavy metals. Objectives: To evaluate rapid and reliable high-throughput methods that target foodborne pathogens and to compare their efficiencies in detecting these pathogens in meat and fish. Methods: In a case-control study using analyses of internal standards, researchers quantified and compared recoveries of Salmonella and Shigella at University of Maryland and Veterinary Diagnostic Laboratory and recoveries at the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) for Salmonella, Shigella, Campylobacter, Listeria, and Escherichia coli O157:H7 in raw poultry meat and fish. Results: High sensitivity and specificity of the real-time polymerase chain reaction (PCR) assays provided by the FDA and UMD were established for these organisms, and the PCR methods provided by UMD were shown to be approximately twice as sensitive as the reference method. The FDA method detected Salmonella and Shigella in a variety of commodities (meat, poultry, and fish) with comparable sensitivity and specificity in the FDA and UMD analyses. Conclusion: Detection of S. typhimurium, S. enterica, and S. boydii in meat and fish was facilitated by the FDA's high-throughput method, which detected these organisms at levels of 10-50 colony forming units (CFU)/g, similar to those found by UMD.
