This proposal introduces a new keyword, `var-args`, that in effect introduces a generic version of the `args` parameter – that is, any parameter that is defined by a list of parameters. We start by adding a `var-args` keyword to the definition of a parameter that is defined by a list of parameters. We then use this new keyword to allow a parameter to be assigned a list of `args` as a parameter. The `var-args` keyword makes this possible. The sample code specifies a list of possible arguments to the message. The programmer is writing an appropriate message [including a possibly special case] for the argument. The programmer supplies a possible value for each of the arguments to the `to_str` method. The `to_str` method then turns each of the values into a string. The value used for the first argument is the `case` keyword. The next argument is an `args` parameter that is defined in terms of the list of possible values. This example shows that `args` has a more generic meaning than it previously had. The `args` keyword allows it to be defined more generically as a list of a specific kind of parameter. The programmer must write the code to determine the exact kind of argument that it receives. The fact that the `args` keyword provides a generalized method to convert a parameter into a list of values also allows the programmer to treat the `args` parameter more generically in the same way that other parameters are treated. A programmer can refer to a list of `args` arguments in a similar fashion to the way in which a list of `args`
