The present invention pertains to a method and apparatus for thermally manipulating a gas. In particular, the invention pertains to a method and apparatus for removing a selected gas from a mixture of gases and for controlling the temperature of the selected gas. As noted in the Detailed Description of the Prior Art, removal of a gas from a mixture of gases is typically accomplished using an absorption method in which water is added to the gas. Since the density of water is high relative to that of the gas to be removed, the concentration of gas in the mixture can be reduced by compression of the resulting gas-water mixture to a point where the gas is no longer carried by the gas-water mixture into the absorption tower, where the gas is absorbed by the water. One problem associated with the absorption method is that the absorption process is relatively slow since the gas must be placed in contact with the water for a predetermined period of time. Another problem associated with the absorption method is that even though a large quantity of water is used in the absorption process, most of the water is recycled. That is, the gas-water mixture is recycled, with most of the water being removed, then re-used in the absorption process. A significant quantity of water is thus continuously evaporated from the gas-water mixture. A further problem associated with the absorption method is that the process can easily become thermally unstable. For example, the gas-water mixture can become too hot or too cold so that it is impossible to continue the absorption process. Also, the absorption method is very inefficient in that only a relatively small amount of water is usually employed in the absorption process. The present invention pertains to a method and apparatus for removing a selected gas from a mixture of gases and for controlling the temperature of the selected gas. According to the present invention, the temperature of a selected gas is varied by locally heating the selected gas. The heating is accomplished by passing a high intensity light beam into the selected gas. In one embodiment, the heating is accomplished by passing the high intensity light beam into
