In a "vulnerability note" published on Thursday, US-CERT said it had detected "multiple buffer overflows and several logic flaws" that allowed attackers to remotely execute "arbitrary code" with the Mozilla Firefox web browser and email application. US-CERT said it would be assigning an alert status to Mozilla Firefox 31, which has a security fix for the flaws. "Based on the condition of knowledge we could not determine if there are exploits in the wild, and there is limited exploit code available online," the US-CERT noted. "Exploits for all public variants of Firefox for Mac are not currently known and are being actively researched." The security issue affects a wide range of versions of the Mozilla Firefox and Thunderbird email applications, the US-CERT said. US-CERT said there's no additional information about the flaws and reported them on March 28. "Because the previously identified attack vector for this vulnerability is related to specific features in Firefox that are not activated by default, this vulnerability does not affect web browsers in other vendors such as Microsoft Internet Explorer, Google Chrome, Apple Safari, Opera, or Apple Mail," the US-CERT said. Mozilla, the organization behind the popular Firefox web browser, earlier this month patched a slew of security flaws that could have allowed attackers to take control of victims' computers remotely. Out of the 34 vulnerabilities identified, only one was a remote code execution flaw, so it's unlikely hackers are already targeting Firefox users. Firefox users are encouraged to download the latest version of the software, version 31, from Mozilla's website, or directly from Apple's Software Update or Microsoft's Windows Update, the US-CERT said. The US-CERT said users should also be aware of a Firefox browser extension, called TimelineCleaner, that could help protect against security issues. The extension was first identified by security researcher Nikolay Bityukov of Russian security firm Kaspersky Lab earlier this year. In a blog post on Wednesday, Bityukov reported that the extension "violates the Firefox Security Model by injecting code into applications that have not requested it, and by accessing the Firefox updater

I have a collection of recipes and the user can select the ingredients for each recipe from multiple choice options (lets just say pasta, sauce, and red sauce). So I have a table with columns "ingredients" (type:string) and "RecipeID" (type:integer) and additional columns. Is there a way to create unique entries in "ingredients" for the different columns, by querying the user's selection? For example, if the user enters pasta and red sauce, it would create new entries for both "Pasta" and "Red Sauce" in the "ingredients" column. So far I've been outputting the selections by hardcoding the ingredients in the query, but I'm open to other suggestions. A: user_select_recipe(recipe_id) as select recipe_id, ingredients from recipes if there are tables ingredient_type and ingredient_name and ingredient_type_id and recipe_id in recipes, you can do this, otherwise you'll just have to create a dummy table for the result (with recipe_id, ingredients) CREATE TABLE recipe_result (recipe_id int NOT NULL, ingredients text) This invention relates to a method and apparatus for forming, filling and sealing beverage containers with a laminate under conditions of low temperature, low pressures, and in the presence of various components, materials, and/or substances that might otherwise adversely affect the material that will be used as an inner liner for the package. Commercial beverage containers are commonly manufactured by filling a container blank with beverage ingredients followed by sealing of the container in an aluminum can body press.
